Golosh's Successor

The new radio host has just been turned out from fashion's laboratories. This novel bit of footwear, exhibited at the National Shoe Exhibition of Chicago, has a number of virtues to recommend it. First, it will make the flapper flapper, because it has no buckles to switch about after the fashion of the old-fashioned golosh. Then, too, it is very chic, being a hybrid cross between an old-fashioned rubber and a pair of trout-fishing leggings, with a yaler of lamb's wool about the top to brighten the Russian effect and make for durability. Though the fashion calls for the dress being worn outside, the wearer may, if she prefers, tuck in her petticoat around the boot tops and be ready for any weather. One mystery remains—why radio boots?

Revelations of A Wife

HOW LILLIAN PLANNED TO AID MOTHER GRAHAM. My little lad's proposal to go to his grandmother and tell her he was sorry for his childhood did not strike me as a particularly responsive chord in my still resentful consciousness. If I had followed my primitive impulse I should have whispered to him the truth that it had been his grandmother, not he, who had made me a divorcee. But I put my rebellion down firmly, and consoled myself with the reflection that Junior's capitulation was a particularly lucky incident in view of the day before me. For I knew that Lillian had counted upon Mother Graham taking both Junior and Marion into her room and keeping them there while the rest of us stared the reception she had planned for the man who called himself Smith. It was a reflection which had a distinct element of danger, and it was pre-eminently necessary that the children should be kept out of the way. "What's the trouble?" But with Mother Graham in the temper with which she had left my room, our plans were likely to be upset. That she was capable of not having been surprised to learn of her daughters, I knew, and would leaving the house for a visit to one that even now she was packing her trunk, a diversion in which she frequently indulged.

"Ooener go Danzie now!" My small son's voice gave me an inspiration. I picked him up and began to take off his absurd little night suit. "I'll get dressed first," I told him, "and then we'll find Marion. She will take you down to Grandmother."

I had thrown Marion's name in as a step-act, although I knew Mother Graham was extremely fond of Lillian's winsome daughter. But I knew that it would take more than Lillian's charms and Junior's adoration to placate his grandmother. I meant to get hold of Lillian as soon as I could, for if any one could decide the means of making my mother-in-law tractable it was she. Partly dressing Junior, I deposited him in his crib, telling him to put on his stockings, a most absorbing occupation in which he delights. Then throwing my bathrobe around me, I opened the door softly, slipped down the corridor to Lillian's room and knocked lightly. She opened the door immediately and I saw with relief that both she and Marion were almost dressed.

"Pratt, be that your boat is nearly manned," I said, holding the door half ajar, so that I could watch my own room door. "The wireless is sounding the S. O. S. from mine."

"What's the trouble?" Lillian asked with a little laugh. "I thought I heard stentorian tones a minute or two ago, and you look as if you were about to walk the plank."

"A Carefully Laid Plan," I have walked it," I returned, while Marion signaled appreciatively at our nonsense. "Behold me floundering in the water. And I tell you the boat will be scuttled unless you heave to and come to the rescue."

She hitched an imaginary belt and put her hand smartly to her forehead. "Aye, aye, sir. We will now heave ho and to and fro. Marion"—with a complete change of tone—"suppose you run over and see what Junior is up to. Take your brush and comb with you and do your hair if there's time."

"Oh! Auntie Madge! May I dress him?" "I think it might be permitted," I smiled, and she danced out happily. I closed the door after her, and hastily related to Lillian my unfortunate encounter with my mother-in-law. "I'd like to wring her neck," Lillian commented vindictively, "but I'm afraid that's an indoor sport prohibited by the blue laws. What do you suppose she's doing now?"

"Packing her trunk and looking up railway schedules to Pennsylvania," I returned despondently. "At least, that's her usual procedure when she's mortally offended. Then we'll have to work quickly," Lillian sprang up, began to pace the floor. "There's only one ball to dangle before her, and that's the melodramatic one. I'll make her think the whole success of this undertaking depends upon her before we finish with her. And in a way it does, for we need everybody he will stumble into the matrimonial bonds when he isn't looking—as an absent-minded man stumbles into a coal hole.

And that's the way it usually happens.

But if a man only understood himself he would know that there are certain times and certain moods when he is immune to marriage—when a bachelor is as safe and sane and free from danger as well as a married man.

For instance, no man need be afraid of falling in love when he is wrapped up in his work, absorbed in his ambition, filled with his business schemes.

The man who is joyously BUSY from 8 a. m. to 6 p. m. hasn't an emotion or a thought left for any woman.

No man need tremble at the thought of marrying when he is particularly happy and contented, when his digestion is working, when his business is going right and when his friends are plentiful.

He doesn't need anybody, then, to help pity himself.

No man need worry for fear he may fall in love with any one woman when he is already half in love with several.

No man need fear that he will take the fatal step so long as he is perfectly COMFORTABLE—so long as he has a home and a mother or a valet to feed him and cuddle him.

He doesn't need anybody to help him love himself.

These are his safe and sane moods. But, by his same token, let him

WATCH HIS STEP when he is lonely.

When he is suffering from a bitter disappointment and is feeling abused.

When he has just broken off a little heart-affair and is feeling bored and distrustful and disillusioned.

When he is ill and weak and has no fight left in him.

When time hangs heavy on his hands and his friends and amusements have begun to bore him.

When somebody has given him a blow in his vanity.

Then, ah, then, is he steering straight for the cliffs—and no amount of shouting can stop him.

For these are the marrying moods! And not all the advice, and all the philosophy, and all the determination in the world can prevent him from snatching at the first little bit of feminine fluff that catches his eye—and tying himself for life!

And then he blames heaven and women because "marriage is a failure"—nothing but a "consolation prize."

BACHELORS—AND OTHERS. To a bachelor, marriage is just life's third rail.

Heat expands—and the bachelor heart, that expanded so under last summer's prospect that it took in half a dozen girls, is now contracted with the cold thought of how to get out of a few entanglements before Christmas.

You can't tame a wild animal after it is old enough to have forgotten its second teeth, nor a wild bachelor after he is forty—and has gotten his second wind.

For a man, fitness in love consists in knowing intuitively when the psychological moment has arrived to take the first kiss; for a woman, in knowing when the ultimate moment has arrived for the last kiss.

Tears may make a bachelor's heart shrink, but nothing will make his love fade so quickly as too sunny a smile of encouragement.

The honeymoon is not over until a man stops feeling sorry for his lonely bachelor friends, and begins to "wonder what they are doing these—Hohum!—long, long evenings."

A confirmed bachelor is a collection of habits and idiosyncrasies completely surrounded by caution.

Every man NEEDS a wife, if only as something to take his mind off his golf and his stomach, and put it on his work and his soul.

A bachelor's heart is never empty. He merely erases one face from the tablet of memory by sketching another across it.

Most married men wear out—most bachelors slowly and comfortably let their hearts and emotions rust out.
